1 Since Ries Hayes had previously conceived residences in New York, Hawaii, and Miami, principal David Ries already had insight into their art collection, which includes pieces by Pat Steir, Richard Serra, and Tadashi Sato, whose colorful artwork hangs in the parents' living room. "Each room is designed with a consistent palette of three or four hues at most. However, the color formula is shaken up with the clients' art selections," says Ries of the paintings and sculptures that migrated to the newly revamped address. "They gravitate toward pieces that are bold and intense, which ultimately energize each room." rieshayes.com

2 In the study connected to the parents' primary bedroom, light floods through the lattice base and reflects off the rivets embedded in the top of a 1970s Basilan table by Afra and Tobia Scarpa, who created this striking wood chair. "Their taste is cleaner, more modern, but in all the homes we've done for them, there's this warmth," says Ries of his clients' style. "The dark tones of this Scarpa desk help define its form and truly enhance its sculptural quality." nilufar.com

3 The primary bath in the parents' wing—complete with a sunny Alison Manaut painting over a tub by MTI Baths—adheres to many of the home's design cues. "We always knew that the primary bath's view of the water would be stunning so we designed a window inspired by Marcel Breuer to frame it," Ries says. "The high-polished tile floor beautifully reflects the natural light, contrasting with the otherwise honed surfaces throughout." mtibaths.com

4 All three wings open onto the pool terrace, where a newly acquired sculpture by Jun Kaneko adds visual interest. "He is a phenomenal Japanese American artist," says Ries. "I've seen his work in smaller-scale sculptures, but this happens to be really big, and really cool." junkaneko.com
